

'What you need is a jolly good smacked bottom!' The threat in Part 1 seems to make it all too easy, doesn't it? Susan has brought rubble crashing down across the TARDIS door, blocking them out, and the Doctor has stern reprisals in mind. So he sits down on a piece of debris, turns his errant granddaughter across his knee, and raises his right hand to administer punishment.

Ian takes the Doctor by the wrist, stopping him from slapping his palm down onto Susan's squirming bottom. 'Just a moment, Doctor. Do you want the noise to bring down some more?'

The Doctor stifles a moment's fury, and acknowledges Ian's point. 'Good thinking, Chesserman,' he says, releasing his grip from Susan's waist. 'Get up, child. But don't think you've heard the last of this.' Susan struggles to her feet, unsteadily because of her sprained ankle. Part of her is relieved at her narrow escape, but part is apprehensive that nemesis has only been deferred – and when they get back into the TARDIS, she will probably get her spanking on the seat of her panties!

So the story continues on course, with Susan staying with Barbara while the Doctor and Ian go to look for cutting equipment. We skip forward to Part 5, and have the chance to clear up an anomaly in the television version. When Susan and Barbara meet the resistance fighters in Part 1, Barbara says she can cook, and Susan says, 'I eat,' implying that she can't cook. That's reasonable enough, I guess, because she has the TARDIS food machine. But in Part 5, there she is, preparing a meal. Not in the Spanking Adventures version: she goes off to catch a fish leaving David Campbell to do the cookery.

With the roles reversed, the 'fresh fish' scene becomes a clear spanking opportunity, when Susan dangles her stinky catch over David's nose, and he retaliates. Susan ends up over his knee, bottom in the air, squealing as her prank gets its just reward and the tight seat of her pants gets sharply dusted by David's palm.

The Doctor makes his way to the clearing, sees what is happening, and decides he'd better come in again, giving the lovebirds more warning. He rustles the bushes, David lets Susan up, and she sits gingerly on the ground as her grandfather huffs into view. 'I can see something's cooking,' he says. It looks as though Susan won't after all be collecting the spanking he owes her when they return to the TARDIS...